THE MAGIC WHITEL,—Among the many inventions which have been patented during the last few months is one by J. Bradburn, book publisher in this city, called the "Magic consists of a wheel of thick pasteboard, around the edge of which are holes cut equi-distant, the wheel revolving on an sais fastened to a wire handle held with the hand. On this wheel is fastened another and smaller wheel, on which are figures of different characters printed or painted. Holding these wheels before a looking through the holes of the outer wheel, and torning it, all the figures on the sampler appear to be in motion. This toy is smassing, and we recommend every pater families to lose no time to gladden the hearts of the little ones by procuring for them the "Mogic Wheel."

Mans a Hir.-John Bradburn, the enterprising publisher, No. 49 Walker-st., is doing a heavy business just now in the magic line, having invented, putented and put into market an article called "THE MAGIC WHEEL," which he finds it difficult to get out fast enough to supply the trade, so great is the demand for it. This Magic Wheel is a very simple con-trivance, and can be worked by a child of tender years, and yet it is capable of affording merriment for both old and young to an almost unlimited extent. "Children cry for them," as Dr. Shermun used to say. John Bradburn, you are in luck.

New Orleans Daily News, June 28, 1864.

A new and interesting and amusing juvenile work is "The Magic Wheel," just published by Bradburn, Mr. Doolady's successor, which is destined to meet with much success. This is not a book, but a toy, and one of the eleverest things ever invented. By looking through the perforations or alits in the rim of the magic wheel, as it is held before a mirror and kep revolving, a few simple figures, painted on circular pieces of pasteboard, attached to the wheel, are made to assume, in the glass, the forms of living and moving persons and animals, which seem miraculously to be endowed with life, and perform the most wonderful antics. The mode in which the illusion is produced would parale even some grown persons to solve, while children are delighted and entertained. A second series of "Magie Wheeh" is now ready. Same price
